The case study is a common and useful type of medical publication. It usually reports the new observation, intervention or rare forgotten findings [1]. It can be a useful resource for many situations such as emergence of outbreak [2]. To report a case study, the reporter has to follow standard ethical practice. In fact in any “international case study and case report journal”, the code of conduct is usually an important concern and requirement. Here, the examples of important code of conduct quoted can be directly assessed from referencing journal <http://case-study-case-report.simdif.com>. With a reference to standard code of conduct, it is expected that all authors have to follow and practice in the correct and ethical way. In brief, these three things have to be strictly considered and followed: a) conflict of interest clearance and declaration, b) and c) inform consent clearance, c) human and animal rights protection and d) clearance for free of plagiarism, duplication and misconduct [3]. Failure for following of the code of conduct usually results in ethical problem, rejection of submitted paper, retraction of the published article or sanctioning by international society [3]. When one start to write a case study for publication, one should concern on the mentioned code of conduct and prepare the manuscript according to the instruction of author. One might expect for an acceptance of article for publication and a good published article can be further worldwide referenced!
